MEG HAS THE LAST WORD

UNTIL he spotted Meg Tillson that day, life had been one long textbook to Mike Green. But Meg was the kind of a girl a fellow looked at—even if the fellow was Mike Green, and a serious senior who divided his time equally between his senior year in high school and his part-time job at Joe's Campus soda fountain with drugstore attached. Meg was about the cutest redhead that the campus had seen in several class generations. Meg was a transfer student and the day she showed up in Mike's psychology class, even the professor allowed himself the luxury of a double take.

Mike had the opportunity every fellow in the room would have given an A plus for—briefing Meg on the first week's lecture and assignments.

After class, when she handed Mike back his notebook after copying down the assignment, she walked down the hall with him, chatting gaily.

"This is my first day. Did you start here? How do you like it?"

Mike found it difficult to realize that he was walking down the hall and chatting with the girl the whole senior psych class had eyed with such interest, but he found it even more difficult to keep up a conversation made up of so many questions.

"Yes, I started here. I guess I like it all right. Courses are fine. I never thought much about the rest of it—the social life and all."

"Oh," Meg blinked at him mischievously. "You're a serious student."

"I'm here to study, if that's what you mean." Mike's guard was up and he thought he detected a note of condescention in the lilting voice. "I'm going to take a pre-med course and it's a matter for serious consideration." The last statement seemed a little stuffy, even to Mike, but it was hard for him to talk to this seemingly lighthearted and frivolous girl. Besides he was due at the drugstore in about five minutes and it was a ten minute walk across campus.

"Oh, please don't get angry. I'm not at all opposed to serious students, honestly. Which way are you going? I'm walking across campus to meet some kids at Joe's for a coke. Want to come along and meet them?" She smiled engagingly at Mike, and he nearly stopped breathing when she mentioned the word "Joe's."

"Uh. No. I've got to go over to the library and grab a reserve book before I go home. I'll see you in class," Mike muttered. He was already late for work and he'd be docked for it sure, but he couldn't go into the drugstore to work until she'd gone. For some reason he couldn't explain to himself, he knew he couldn't go into Joe's and serve cokes to this girl and her laughing group of pals—maybe to have her point him out as that "funny grind in my psych class" and maybe to laugh at him as a "serious student." Mike was 45 minutes late by the time he saw Meg and her gang leave the store. He watched them disappear down the street and then ran in.

Mike rushed into the back of the store; slipped off his sweater, put on his white cap and apron and swung into action behind the counter. He was ashamed of his reason for being late, but not so much as he would have been to have Meg see him here sloshing sodas and making peanut butter sandwiches.

Mike saw Meg often in class and each time they walked down the hall together, they discovered they had more to talk about. But somehow the promising friendship didn't blossom. Mike couldn't bring himself to ask for a date and there were always plenty of fellows who stepped in and took care of that situation, for Meg was a popular girl around school from the moment she arrived.

He'd been lucky and had avoided seeing Meg in the drugstore. One day he had spotted her coming down the street and ducked back into the backroom to take care of some supplies for the fountain. But he knew he couldn't continue to be so fortunate, and he knew the day would come when he'd have to face Meg across a banana split or some such idiotic concoction.

He'd known the time would come, but why would she have to be with that George Briggs —the biggest moneybags in school and also, one of the most unpleasant? Mike ducked his head behind the coke dispenser while they sat down in a booth, Meg with her back to the counter. He sidled over to the booth, waiting discreetly in back of Meg while they looked at the tattered menu.

"Hey, you." Briggs waved at Mike imperiously. "Do you think you can make us a couple of decent chocolate sodas?"

The crack didn't require an answer and Mike stomped off to fix up the order. So far Meg hadn't seen him and if he could manage to keep far enough back of the booth . . .

"Sure, come on. The whole gang will drive up to Blue Lake tonight—there's a real hot spot up there for dancing and . . ." George broke off the conversation as Mike approached with the sodas.

Meg was still shaking her head dubiously at George's last remark, when Mike got up to the booth. He slid George's soda across the table to him neatly without stepping too close to the booth. He tried to do the same with Meg's, but not seeing him behind her, she reached across the table toward the napkin rack, the soda ricocheted off her arm and into her lap, splashing a generous blob of whipped cream across the table on George's surprised face. Meg jumped and Mike pulled off his apron and started mopping at her dress. George finally wiped the whipped cream out of his eye and came snarling out of the booth.

"Why, you dumb hasher—what do you think you're doing? You'll pay for her dress. Do you understand?"

"Don't worry, I'll take care of that. I'll have your dress fixed, Meg. I'm terribly sorry." Mike pushed George out of the way, and he didn't press the point.

"Why Mike, I didn't see you." Meg seemed surprised.

"I work here. I'm sorry I spilled the soda, but you see, I—well, I didn't want you to see me. It's silly, because I know you don't care if I'm a soda jerk or a banker. I'm not as important as all that."

Standing right there, decorated with all that chocolate and whipped cream, Meg suddenly found something funny to laugh at. "Of course, I don't care if you're a banker or a soda jerk —but it's because you are important." She turned to George. "I'm sorry. I'm just too much of a mess to go to your party with you. Thanks anyway. But," she said, turning back to Mike, "I'm sure I can find something suitable for a walk when you're through work at 10, Mike. That is the time you finish isn't it? You see, I walk by here every night on my way home from the library. I'll be glad when you stop hiding behind that counter so I can come in for a coke."
